

ABSTRACT

The Orientation and Position Sensor is a compact, non-contact sensor that measures up to three orientations and up to three positions of an alignment target with respect to a camera. The alignment target has two distinct features, and a lens images those features into a camera. From the camera image, an operator or software can interpret the relative position and size of the features to determine the orientation and position of the alignment target with respect to the camera.